

[From the (Goshen) Independent Republican.]

If further evidence were necessary to prove the defection of the Courier and Enquirer, it might be found in its ceaseless endeavors to excite hostility towards the most prominent men in the state, and in its untiring exertions to array the republicans of one section against those of another. In accordance with this spirit it now attempts to inflame the feelings and excite the jealousies of the New-Yorkers, by representing that an indignity was offered them by the recent Convention in not appointing Abraham Bloodgood esq. President of that meeting. Happily the character of that print is as well understood in the city as it is the country, and these effusions of a rancorous spirit will be attended with no other effect than to exhibit still more clearly its utter worthlessness and degeneracy.
