

[From the N. Y. Evening Post.]

The National Intelligencer copies a long article, which appeared a few days since in the Courier and Enquirer, purporting to be a defence of Webb and Noah from the charge of having been bribed by the United States Bank. In referring its readers to this article, the Intelligencer apologises for admitting so much personality and abuse into its columns, but is particularly careful not to express any opinion as to the fact whether the charge of bribery against the proprietors of the Courier and Enquirer is or is not substantiated. We do not believe that there is in the whole country a single person of ordinary candour and intelligence who is not fully convinced that the transaction was nothing more nor less than a direct bribe—that as such the money was offered, and as such received. Those of our readers who have any desire to peruse an exposition of a portion of the inconsistencies, misrepresentations, contradictions and absurdities into which the proprietors of the Courier and Enquirer have betrayed themselves, are referred to the article copied into a preceding column from the Standard, [entitled “Webb and Noah’s defence.”] Is there a man in the United States who would be hired for $52,975 to change places with those persons?

“How like a hateful ape they look,
