

Saturday, May 26, 1832.

In consequence of the extreme length of the various documents embraced in our "extra," we could not get them all in type until the latter part of the week. For this reason we shall not be able to furnish the extra to all our subscribers along with our present number, but all who do not receive it this week, may certainly expect it the next.

---

Unwilling to interfere with our usual variety, and anxious to present our readers with the Bank Reports, we have at great expense issued a supplement to our present number, containing Mr. McDUFFIE's report, Mr. ADAMS's report, and Mr. McDUFFIE's speech, in relation to the Bank of the United States.

These important documents, which will form a part of our national history, ought to be carefully read and examined by all who wish to become familiar with the great principles upon which a national banking institution must be governed; and they, who deliberate upon the facts which they exhibit, and the comprehensiveness of argument which they display, will perceive and acknowledge the necessity and utility of the present Bank of the United States.

It must be highly gratifying to Mr. Biddle that, notwithstanding the base attempt made to injure his character, he has come out of the late investigation with renewed claims upon the confidence of his fellow-citizens; and has effectually triumphed over the united efforts of envy and malignity. Under his administration, the affairs of the Bank are shown to have been prosperous beyond all former precedent; and his integrity, ability and decision of character are universally admitted.