O what a trying world is this, Where purest minds are prone to ill; Where fortune's smiles afford no bliss And anxious care pursues us still The young who dance in pleasure's ring, The wise, the noble and the brave; Await alike deaths dreadful sting, And their last refuge is the grave! Child of misfortune, dry thy tears, Thy aching bosom bleeds in vain; Thy course thro' nature's feeting years, Is but the record of thy pain Tis vain to weep—one pang the less Shall not thy bosom's peace invade; Thy days on earth must know distress, For this thy anxious heart was made. If not designed-yet well we know That sorrow haunts our happiest hour; Nor reason's voice can ere bestow, A respite to the demon's power. The love of friends, nor beauty's smile, Nor gownsmen filled with priestly lore; Can for one fleeting hour beguile Tue sufferings that we all deplore. One bliss remains, our days are few, Tho' sore oppressed with strife and care, What else betides none can review, But all may fancy in their prayer. Beyond the grave no eye hath seen. No traveller tells his ghostly tale; Oblivion draws her hand between, And silence haunts the awful vale.
