

We announce with pleasure the return of Col. Brearley, and the delegation of Creek Indians, who accompanied him to the Arkansas Territory, for the purpose of exploring the country, and selecting a place for the future residence of those of the Creeks who may choose to emigrate thither.

About four months have elapsed since they left this place, and, as we learn, proceeded in the steam-boats by the way of N. Orleans, up the Mississippi, and as far as the Dardannells on the Arkansas river; then procured horses, and travelled to Fort Gibson, which is on the frontier of Arkansas, where they were generously received and promptly aided by Col. Arbuckle and the officers of the garrison. The whole of the delegation speak in the highest terms of the general feelings expressed by the citizens of the territory of Arkansas, and of the Cherokees, whom they represent as being most happily situated. They also secured the friendship of the Osages, with whom they are to become neighbours. The result of this exploring expedition is highly interesting to our State to the General Government, and to the Indians. There is concurrence of opinion expressed by the whole delegation in regard to the country shewn them by Col. Brearley; and they acknowledge that it exceeded their expectations, in soil, climate, and game—of the latter they were particularly pleased with the buffalo. We are induced to believe, from a detailed and minute account of the country explored, from the present condition of the Indians, and from the embarrassing state of affairs between the General Government and the two States interested in the several treaties, that inducements will be offered by the United States, sufficient, under proper management, to effect the entire removal of the Creek Nation at an early period.—We understood that the delegation appointed the 29th July, for a meeting at the Falls of the Chatahoochie, where they will in a Grand Talk, give an account of their mission, soon after which it is expected they will prepare to emigrate.—Alabama Journal, July 20.
